This globe is a theatre of war; its inhabitants are all heroes. The little crab is swagge, and the animals in proportion, I believe are quarrelsome. The Riot at Lockport.—The laborers employed on the Canal at Lockport, while keeping Christmas Eve, after getting fairly in-to their cups, engaged in an unprofitable contest to see which could do the other the most harm. The scene soon changed from a pitched battle to a riot, which excited considerable uneasiness among the citizens. The rioters, we are informed, attempted to rase several buildings. Stones flew as thick as blackberries, and bludgeons were brandishing in every direction. Two persons (citizens) were mortally wounded, and several others very seriously injured. Many of the offenders were arrested the next day, and while under examination, a rescue was threatened by their comrades, and it is said that the military was called out for the protection of the court. Fourteen of the rioters are in prison.

The Lieut. Governor, having taken the oath of office, repaired to the senate Chamber, for the purpose of attending to the organizing of that body, should a quorum appear. The Lieut. Governor contends, that the constitution has designated the first of January, as the time for the legislature to convene. He considers the view which the Chief Justice has taken of this subject, as incorrect. Only two senators attended, to whom the usual oaths were administered, and then they adjourned. It is the intention of those present, to meet and adjourn from day to day until a quorum appear. The Clerk of the Assembly attended in the Assembly chamber; eight members appeared, and were sworn, and then adjourned, they likewise intend to meet from day to day, until a quorum of that house shall appear.

The Hon. Henry Clay has published in the National Intelligencer a communication on the subject of the Ghent negotiation, in which he states that the pamphlet, published by Mr. Adams, contains some errors as to matters of fact and of opinion, and to the part he took in certain transactions, which "at some future time more proper to us than the present for calm and dispassionate consideration, and when there can be no misinterpretation of motives," he had explain to the public. Mr. Adams in reply to this says, that "let the appropriate dispositions, when and how they will, expose the open day and secret night of the transactions at Ghent, the statements both of fact and opinion, in the papers which he has written and published, will, in every particular, essential or important to the interest of the "One evening near the end of October, we sat down after supper to play at cards. Signior Agostino was of the party, but soon retired to bed. About eleven o'clock, his valet came to inform us his master was afflicted, if we wished to see him. I observed him some time with a candle in my hand; he was sleeping on his back, and slept with his eyes open, but they were steadily fixed; this, according to his valet's account, was a certain sign of approaching derangement. I left his hands; they were very cold, and his pulse so languid, that it seemed as though his blood did not circulate.—Near midnight, Signior Agostino violently pulled back the curtains of his bed, got up, and dressed himself very quickly. I went towards him, and placed a candle near his nose to which he was totally insensible; his eyes were wide open.—Before he put on his hat, he took his belt, which hung on the bed-post, but from which his sword had been taken for fear of an accident. Thus dressed; he made several turns round his chamber, then went towards the fire, and seated himself in an arm chair.

A short time after this, he went into a closet where his portmanteau was; this he searched a long time, turned every thing out replaced them again in good
